"Die tote Frau-die tote Stadt," moaned Paul in Erich Korngold's opera on Saturday afternoon at the Metropolitan Opera House. "The dead wife; the dead city." The curtain fell on both to rise last evening on a live city, a live girl and a live artist.

It does not take from Saturday afteroon to Monday evening to travel from Bruges to Paris, but perhaps so long an interval was good to have between Korngold's "Die tote Stadt" and Char-pentier's "Louise." To bring them too ose together might accentuate the dif-close together might accentuate the differences between the opera of the dead and that of the living.

The performance of "Louise" had no new features. The Louise of Miss Geraldine Farrar shows no material changes. Perhaps she did not sing the music quite so loudly as she used to, but this ought to be accounted to her giory, since most things are habitually too loud at the Metropolitan. Miss Farrar sang with care, and while the volume of her voice was not large the quality was better than it was in the same part last season. Mr. Whitchill's impersonation of the Father remained the outstanding one among the principals. This excellent artist sings and acts the part with feeling and with a keen sense of dramatic values. He wins for the character the sympathy it requires and deserves. Mr. Harrold's Julien is cast in stalwart mould. There is a touch of the cave man about him and no one wonders that he carries off such a weakling cs Louise.

man about him and no one wonders that he carries off such a weakling as Lou.se. Mme. Berat was praiseworthy, as always, as the Mother.

The scene of the street cries and that of the sewing room were generally well done, while, of course, the good old fashioned opera of the Montmartre festival went with senerity and solvit. In fashioned opera of the Montmartre fes-tival went with sonority and spirit. In fact Paris, of which the very name seemed so thrilling to the people who had lived there all their lives, was a renuinely gay old town and every one in the audience knew it.
